

Physical Activity Background Information

Our bodies are made to move! They were not made to sit still for most of the day at home, at work, or in the car. Long commutes & changes in the way we work has meant some people spend a lot of their day sitting or standing still. Your workplace may not be able to change the type of work, but you can change the job design (variety of tasks and breaks).

Why is Important?

Helping people move more can also help a business' bottom line. Workplaces that encourage their people to sit less and move more can enjoy benefits such as: improved staff productivity, reduced numbers of musculoskeletal disorders and injuries, reduced absenteeism, as well as presenteeism and greater staff retention.

Time is often identified as a barrier to being active. Working adults spend approximately 60% of their waking hours at work, with some spending additional time travelling to and from work. Many jobs involve low levels of movement, with long periods of time seated in front of a computer or operating machinery. Creating a workplace wellbeing policy that includes flexible working hours and arrangements can limit the barrier to being active and create opportunities for staff to engage more regularly in physical activity.

There are many ways to increase physical activity during the working day and spend less time sitting. Regular movement throughout the working day can be just as important for health as planned exercise.

Ministry of Health recommend that we 'sit less, move more' and that even small breaks from prolonged sitting are good for the health. In terms of physical activity, the Ministry of Health recommend that adults engage in at least 2 ½ hours of moderate or 1 ¼ hours of vigorous physical activity spread throughout the week.

Benefits of being active at work include better overall health, improved self-esteem, more energy and increased productivity. Being active is one of the Mental Health Foundations Five Ways to Wellbeing and is shown to lift our mood and reduce stress.
